This former barn for hay was close to collapse when the architect agreed to rebuild it, while keeping the essential aspects of its original appearance and most of its old wood. The stone base of the structure was rebuilt in concrete with spaces added below grade. The kitchen and bathroom are located in this new area. A large window that “appears to be carved directly into the mountainside” was also added. The architect explains that this gesture can be seen as a contemporary interpretation of the traditional basins used to give cows water that are often seen in the region. The interior, they say, “almost gives the impression of being part of a gallery where the artwork hangs outside.”
